The Romanesque fortress chapel was discovered by archaeologists in 1994 and is one of the oldest examples of building within the fortress. The chapel was built in the first half of the 12th century during the rule of Archbishop Konrad I of Abensberg (1106–1147) and after being redeveloped several times under Archbishop Leonhard von Keutschach (1495–1519) it was destroyed. Parts of the north wall have survived, as has the west wall with a blocked off doorway, and a bay structure with the remains of columns and supports. In the back-filled section of the chapel there have been discoveries of furnishing and decorative elements, and fragments of stucco and fresco work.

The Bratislava Castle has been inhabited since the late Stone Age. Its first written record dates back to the year 907. The Coronation Tower, located in the southwest of the Palace, was built in 13th century and it is standing till today. During the reign of Sigismund of Luxemburg (1387 - 1437) the castle underwent a radical Gothic reconstruction. After 1526 the castle became the seat of Hungarian monarchs. Under the reign of Maria Teresa (1740 - 1780) the castle was transformed into a luxurious Baroque residence. In 1811 the castle was burnt down and its reconstruction was only undertaken in 1953. The Bratislava Castle is currently administered by the Chancellery of the National Council of the Slovak Republic and houses the Museum of History of the Slovak National Museum.
